New research shows communication breakdowns in hospitals undercut the effectiveness of safety tools and negatively impact patient outcomes

Results of “The Silent Treatment”, a study of 6,500 nurses and nurse managers, to be announced March 22 in Philadelphia as five-year follow-up to “Silence Kills” research

WHAT: American Association of Critical-Care Nurses (AACN), Association of periOperative Registered Nurses (AORN) and VitalSmarts will release findings from “The Silent Treatment: Why Safety Tools and Checklists Aren't Enough to Save Lives” at a news conference March 22 in Philadelphia.

The study of more than 6,500 nurses and nurse managers — a five-year follow-up to the groundbreaking study “Silence Kills” — reveals healthcare professionals make calculated risks daily to not alert their colleagues when a safety tool signals potential harm. According to the study, 85 percent of healthcare workers report being in a situation where a safety tool worked and yet, more than half (58 percent) failed to effectively speak up and solve the problem.

AACN and AORN — two of the largest specialty nursing associations in the world — with VitalSmarts, an innovator in research-based corporate training and organizational performance, partnered on the research to identify communication barriers that contribute to avoidable medical errors and provide solutions to improve patient outcomes.

WHO: The following panel of prominent healthcare experts will discuss the implications of this new research and be available for interviews after the news conference.

- Dorrie Fontaine, RN, PhD, FAAN, dean and professor, University of Virginia School of Nursing.
- Linda Groah, RN, MSN, CNOR, CNAA, FAAN, executive director/chief executive officer, Association of periOperative Registered Nurses.
- David Maxfield, vice president of research, VitalSmarts, and lead researcher.
- Peter Pronovost, MD, PhD, FCCM, professor, Anesthesiology/Critical Care Medicine and Surgery, Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine.
